A caution respecting the Measles.

AT this season of the Year diarrhoea, or looseness of the bowels, is apt to prevail, especially among children, which arises from the debility and relaxation produced by the heat of the summer, and frequently abates without much m[edicin]al assistance as the weather grows cooler.

But if this disorder attends a child when it is first attacked with the measles, or if it takes place at any period before the eruption is complete, it prevents the salutary eruption through the skin, and the matter which ought to be thrown out on the surface of the body, fixes upon the stomach, bowels, or lungs and is suddenly productive of the most dangerous and fatal consequences.

Under these circumstances it becomes indispensibly necessary to the safety of the patient to put an immediate stop to the looseness; which may be affected by a free use of the Elixir Asthmatic, or some other anodine, a fomentation of warm wine applied to the bowels, and a plentiful use of wine whey internally.

Particular care should be taken to distinguish between the looseness of the bowels above mentioned, and that which usually takes place at the crisis or turn of the measles. The latter is highly salutary, and ought never to be checked, unless it becomes dangerous, (which is seldom the case) from its excess, and then not without caution and the best advice.
